SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE

The Civil War has been regarded by scholars, students, and history buffs as one of the most important, influential, and compelling events in American history. Individually and collectively, these battles and campaign histories and personal narratives constitute a source of great historical value. The accounts in this collection, compiled both during the war and afterward (through 1930), chronicle the “first modern war” and its legacy of “war is hell” and war for a “noble cause.”

Civil War Battles and Campaigns encompasses the official and literary battle and campaign histories and personal narratives (of specific battles) listed in Charles E. Dornbusch’s Military Bibliography of the Civil War, Volume III. UPA has included a large number of items gleaned from a variety of other sources, including the National Union Catalog, other Civil War bibliographies, and Civil War holding lists and card files from various libraries and institutions.

Authors of these histories and narratives consist of veteran officers and private soldiers-turned-writers—espousing their perceptions of the battlefield for local veterans organizations and/or small-town publishers—and scholars and “distinguished men” of the era, writing justifications and indictments of the war, its battlefields, barbarism, and memorials. In addition, histories relating to the Western Theater include a variety of accounts on “riverine” warfare. This unique form of warfare, mastered by Union forces, led to the fracturing of the Confederacy along the Tennessee, Mississippi, Cumberland, and Red rivers.

These writings provide a wealth of detail on the clashes of the two armies, confrontations between generals and privates, strategy and tactics, and the events leading to the final outcome. The personal narratives provide information on the individual level of combat. They poignantly recount the death and destruction as seen from the battlefield—the lying in wait for the attack, the shelling from the enemy’s guns, personal combat—brother against brother, father against son, family against family.

These are more than just dry accounts of troop movements and engagements. Many are detailed accounts of the daily events in a campaign, the growing casualty lists, descriptions of the commencement of battle and the rising tide of the fierceness and fury of the fight. The following quote relates to the moment before the Union army broke into open rout during the First Battle of Bull Run:

The noise of the cannonading was deafening and continuous. How anxiously we strained our eyes to catch the various movements, thoughtless of everything but the spectacle unfolding.... Now and then there would be a fierce rush into the open prospect of contested ground, a gallant charge on one side and a retreat on the other.

The Civil War was not fought in one arena between two contending forces. Rather, operations were conducted in three distinct theaters: the East, extending from the Atlantic to the Appalachian Mountains; the West, stretching from the windward side of the Appalachians to the Mississippi; and the Trans-Mississippi West, consisting of the sparsely populated territories and states of the far west. (For the purposes of this collection, UPA has combined the latter two theaters into one.) Until the 1864 advent of coordinated campaigns by Union Generals Grant and Sherman, military operations in one theater had little bearing on or relationship to army movements elsewhere.

THIS PUBLICATION has been divided into three sections: Part 1. Eastern Theater; Part 2. Western Theater; and Part 3. General References and Collected Works. The Eastern Theater includes the operations of the Union armies of the Potomac, Virginia, James, Shenandoah, and West Virginia, and covers the states of Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Florida. Operations by the Confederate army of Northern Virginia and its various corps are highlighted. (Generally Union armies were named after a major river in an operational area, while Confederate armies were designated by regions or states, but there are exceptions.) There are a few histories on a little known military operation by invading Confederate raiders and Canadian sympathizers against the town of St. Albans, Vermont.

The Western Theater includes operations by all the various western and trans-Mississippi armies. These include the Union armies of the Cumberland, of the Ohio, of the Tennessee, of the Gulf, and of Georgia. Operations by the Confederate armies of Tennessee, Mississippi, the West, and the Southwest are also highlighted. The Western Theater includes the midwestern states of Ohio and Indiana; the “middle south” states of Kentucky and Tennessee; and the Deep South, consisting of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia. Trans-Mississippi states include Missouri, Arkansas, Texas, and New Mexico.

Within each theater the histories are arranged by state, then alphabetically by battle name. Several states have a general references section that includes histories that describe several operations in a state and/or describe the war in a particular theater of operations. Generally, Northerners referred to battles by the closest stream or river, such as Bull Run and Stones River. In contrast, Southerners tended to name battles after the nearest community, such as Manassas and Pittsburgh Landing. But, quite often, both sides used the same designation for an engagement. Chickamauga, Gettysburg, and The Wilderness are a few examples.

The Civil War was the most traumatic experience in the life of the American Republic. No other chapter in America’s history has contributed so much to our literary heritage and folklore. The very words—whether they are the “Civil War,” “War of the Rebellion,” or “War Between the States”—conjure up a hundred images: Jackson “standing like a stonewall”; Lee astride Traveller, and at the Battle of Fredericksburg uttering “it is well war is so terrible, or we would get too fond of it”; the massed confusion of soldiers and spectators fleeing the afternoon battle scene at Bull Run; Barbara Fritchie waving the Union flag out of her window while Jackson’s troops march through the streets of Frederick, Maryland; Confederate General A. P. Hill breaking through the wheat fields at Antietam; Union General Thomas “standing like a rock” at Chickamauga; Confederate General Pickett’s troops streaming up the long slope of Cemetery Ridge into the Union cannonade; the soldiers of the Army of the Cumberland scrambling up the rugged heights of Missionary Ridge; Confederate General Hood taking the lead in closing the gap at Spotsylvania; Sheridan dashing up and down the Winchester Pike; and Grant and Lee at Appomattox Court House. The volumes in this publication will further illuminate the crucible of the war.

ARRANGEMENT OF MATERIAL

Items in this publication pertain to the description of Civil War Battles and Campaigns, Part 3. The individual items have been arranged by document type—official battle lists, general references, reports of the Joint Congressional Committee on the Conduct of the War, and operations reports collected and/or compiled by the Confederate States of America’s War Department, Generals Ulysses S. Grant and Winfield S. Scott during the war, and the War Records Office. Under each type, the items are arranged in alphabetical order by author. Where applicable, an abbreviated form of the title is used in lieu of “no author;” this follows the arrangement set forth in Dornbusch’s Military Bibliography of the Civil War.

Common to all specific items is the following information.

GR: 365. Foster, Eli Greenawalt.

SOURCE NOTE

This micro publication is based on the official and literary battle and campaign histories and personal narratives listed in Charles E. Dornbusch's Military Bibliography of the Civil War, Volume III. A large number of items, however, are drawn from other sources, with many published overseas.

The books and pamphlets included in this microfiche publication have been collected and collated from a large number of source institutions. The source for each item has been listed in the Fiche Index under each item by its Online Computer Library Center (OCLC) library code. A list of both the OCLC symbols and the institutional names is available on page xi.

EDITORIAL NOTE

The books and pamphlets collected in this publication have been filmed in their entirety and were printed prior to 1931. Every effort has been made to include the original edition of each item. Revised editions have been filmed in lieu of original editions when necessary. In a very few cases original editions and a revised edition have been included. This has occurred when a large portion of the original has been revised significantly. Periodical literature, newspapers, broadsides, imprints, and unpublished manuscripts have not been included in this micro publication.

The accounts in Civil War Battles and Campaigns, Part 3: General References and Collected Works, compiled both during the war and afterward (through 1930), chronicle the “first modern war” and its legacy of “war is hell” and war for a “noble cause.”

This collection encompasses the official and literary battle and campaign histories and personal narratives (of specific battles) listed in Charles E. Dornbusch’s Military Bibliography of the Civil War, Volume III. LexisNexis has also included a large number of items gleaned from a variety of other sources, including the National Union Catalog, other Civil War bibliographies, and Civil War holding lists and card files from various libraries and institutions.

Authors of these histories and narratives consist of veteran officers and private soldiers-turned-writers—espousing their perceptions of the battlefield for local veterans organizations and/or small-town publishers—and scholars and “distinguished men” of the era, writing justifications and indictments of the war, its battlefields, barbarism, and memorials.
